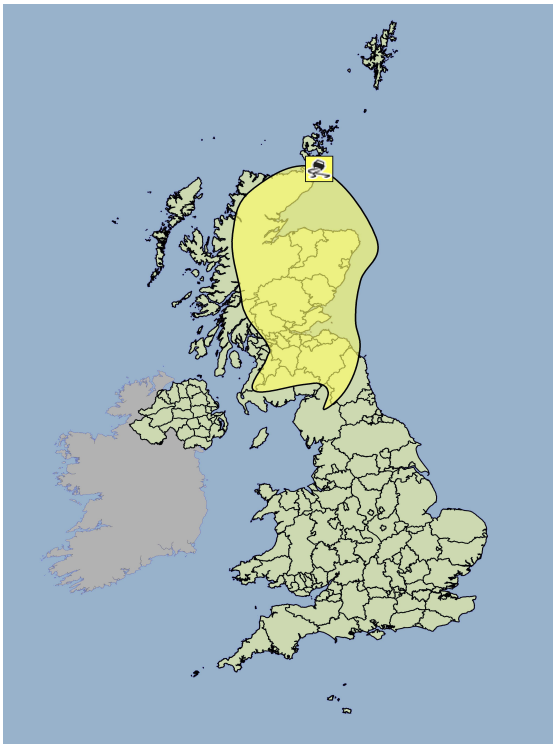
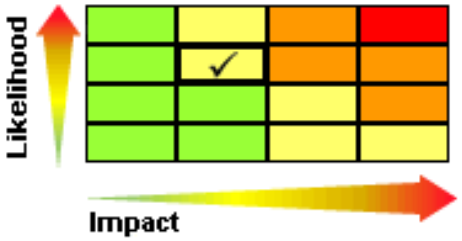
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A frontal system will clear slowly northeastwards during the early hours of Monday, finally clearing the far northeast of the Scottish mainland towards the end of the night. As skies clear behind the frontal system, falling temperatures will lead to icy stretches forming on untreated surfaces. In addition, showers following into northwest Scotland may lead to wash-off of earlier road treatment, enhancing the risk of ice formation here.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Ice

Valid from 01:00 on Mon, 13th Jan 2014 until 10:00 on Mon, 13th Jan 2014

Rain and hill snow will clear slowly northeastwards during the early hours of Monday followed by clearing skies. This will allow temperatures to fall to near or below freezing leading to icy stretches forming on untreated surfaces. Higher routes are most at risk.

The public should be aware that this could lead to disruption to transport.
